the acceptance in designing of some architect or of some particular class of buildings as a model It may be tolerated as it is in poetry and painting so long as the style and spirit of the original are preserved Thus Virgil imitated Homer and Andrea del Sarto imitated Raffaello Imitation is designing in the spirit copyism is following the lines of the original The imitator however should have natural and original genius of his own although he may be obliged to submit to certain conventional rules He must endeavour to do what the original author would have done had he been in his place he must be his disciple and not his mimic still less must he pilfer and especially should not claim the praise due to his model It must be left to every one's own good sense to determine how far he may venture to imitate and to follow another as various circumstances control the artist in various ways It must not however be forgotten that straining after originality frequently leads to eccentricity and still worse to deformity as too often illustrated in the works of the modern Gothic and Italian schools
