Differences in Songs and Calls, their Production and Biological Significance

Anil Kumar

Anil Kumar is working at Wildlife Institute of India, Dehradun. His research work over the years is focused on the behavioural ecology and sociobiology of birds with special reference to songs, calls and visual displays.

The article highlights the biological significance of songs and calls in birds. The structural diversity of songs and its relevance for social behaviour are described. Acoustic communication plays an important role in the life of birds and has proven useful in establishing phylogenetic and evolutionary relationships among species.

Communication is an integral part of animal behaviour. Birds communicate with each other primarily by means of visual and vocal signals. Elaborate or cryptic plumage, brightly coloured bare skin, wattles, tail, beak and feet are used in communication, with or without accompanying acoustic signals. Sound is an ideal method for communication over long distances. Acoustic signals seem to be produced only when required, and sound can be used to transmit a large amount of information efficiently.

Vocal signals play an important role in the life of birds in a variety of aspects like pair maintenance, parent-offspring interactions, cohesiveness among flock or family members, and threat situations. The sound spectrogram (graphic representation of a sound also known as sonogram) technique is a well-established method to characterize acoustic signals on the basis of their frequency, duration and amplitude (Box 1). In many birds, the features of acoustic signals have been used as species signature to infer phylogenetic and evolutionary relationships. These detailed features of acoustic signals tend to be similar in closely related species and to be more divergent in more distantly related ones. In some species, vocal signals can also be used as a tool in population size estimation. Studies on the acoustic communication of bird species in India, however, have been rather
