

27.4.3 Set Three

I used to love going to visit my grandmother at her house in Staunton, Virginia. She had a huge backyard where my brother, my cousin, and I would play for hours, losing ourselves in imagined worlds. We climbed trees, built forts, and staged attacks on each other's "kingdoms," sometimes pretending to be goblins or trolls. When my grandmother rang the bell for dinner, our invented landscapes would evaporate into the evening air as we went running to wash our hands.

Uncle Joe loved to reminisce about his years as an ice road trucker. It was clear that he derived a great deal of pride from having been one of the few to stick with the job, which was incredibly dangerous and physically taxing. He told me that he had driven through more blizzards than he could remember. He had changed tires. He had navigated slippery, narrow roads above deep chasms, where one false move could send the rig tumbling down a mountainside.
