

Active transport

Moving molecules in organisms

Humans are complex organisms with lots of cells to keep healthy, but even single-celled organisms need to be able to move molecules in and out of their cells.

There are 3 ways to move substances in and out of cells:

- Diffusion
- Osmosis
- Active transport

All three are used by humans and plants

Active transport

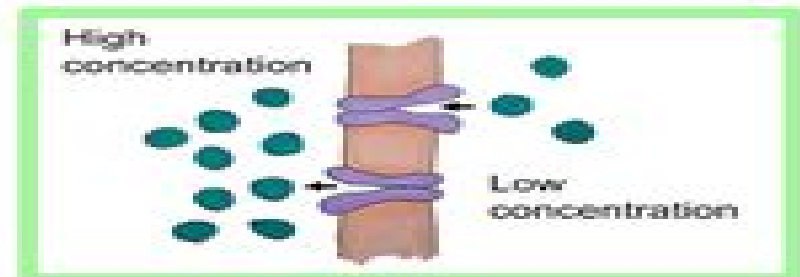

Active transport is the movement of substances from an area of low concentration to an area of high concentration. Active transport moves particles against the concentration gradient. To do this it requires energy, and is therefore an active process.

You can think about this as moving substances from a dilute solution to a concentrated solution.

The energy for active transport comes from respiration.

Protein transporters

Quite often the particles moving in active transport need some help to get across membranes. For this reason they often move through carrier proteins. This act like doors that can open and close to let certain substances through. These often require energy to function.

Examples

Plants - plants need lots of mineral ions to function. These are absorbed from the soil, however they are usually in low concentrations in the soil. Plants will have much higher concentrations of mineral ions in their cells than in the soil. For this reason active transport is used to move mineral ions into the plant against the concentration gradient.

Animals - glucose is absorbed into the villi from the lumen of the small intestine using active transport. This is as well as diffusion. The amount of glucose being moved into the blood means that the concentration of glucose in the blood becomes higher than the concentration in the small intestine. To get the maximum amount of glucose into the body active transport is used to move it against the concentration gradient.
