

Assessment and management of the severely polytraumatized small animal patient

Dennis T. (Tim) Crowe, Jr., DVM, DACVS, DACVECC, EMT-II, GCFF

Abstract

Objective: To review the current recommendations for the care of the seriously injured polytraumatized small animal patient, including team organization and facility readiness; scene assessment and care; transport; and hospital assessment and care.

Data sources: Original research articles, scientific reviews, book chapters, and clinical experience.

Human data synthesis: The care of the seriously injured patient is demanding and requires adequate preparation, rapid access to organized resources and equipment, and skilled personnel. Second in urgency only to stabilization of the airway and breathing is shock. In many, surgical intervention to provide improved and continued stability is required. Evidence is provided by data published comparing survival for humans with high injury scores being cared for at level I trauma centers compared with small rural hospitals. Personal experience as a member of an emergency medical teams in the care of multiple injured human patients in both level I trauma centers and small hospitals is also used in this review.

Veterinary data synthesis: Publications reporting large clinical series of seriously injured dogs and cats are minimal. Experimental animal models of shock caused by blood loss and the study of various organ injuries and their management are numerous. These and 35 years of the author's experience in managing severely injured dogs and cats (estimated to be >750) is also used in this review for generation of guidelines.

Conclusions: Guidelines for care of severe multiple injury patients are presented and are recommended to be used in clinical veterinary medical practice to improve outcome.

Introduction

Extensive trauma involving multiple body sites and organ systems has been reported to occur in >30% of all canine trauma patients with most deaths caused by intrathoracic, intraabdominal, and central nervous system injury.¹ The objective of this review is to present current recommendations for the care of the multiple site or organ system, seriously injured (polytraumatized) small animal patient, including team organization and facility readiness; scene assessment and care; transport; and hospital assessment and care. A summary of the most important clinical issues (concerns) regarding the diagnostics and management of the severely polytraumatized patient are made in this overview. For further information, please consult other texts and web sites.^{2,3,4}

Readiness

The care of the severely polytraumatized patient requires around the clock readiness that include the facilities, supplies, equipment, and staff.^{2,3} A trauma resuscitation or 'ready' area should be available at all times for initial resuscitation (Table 1). This decreases time, from arrival to completed resuscitation, which is correlated with increased survival in pediatric and adult humans and likewise in dogs and cats.^{2–6} Readiness for the severely polytraumatized patient requires specialized facilities, equipment, and supplies because of the need for immediate resuscitation and emergency surgical procedures to stabilize the patient (Table 2). Examples include mechanical ventilation, whole blood and plasma, plasma substitutes (colloids), and an operating room that is fully prepared to receive the dying severely polytraumatized patient (Table 3). Immediate transfer of the most critical patient to the operating room in order to perform resuscitative thoracotomy,
