

Iron Oxyhydroxides, Sulfides and Oxyhydroxysulfates as Indicators of Acid Sulfate Weathering Environments

R.W. Fitzpatrick and P.G. Self

Abstract

Iron oxyhydroxides, oxyhydroxysulfates and sulfides are important indicators of weathering environments. The relative proportions of these various secondary iron minerals are critically dependant on soil chemistry; in particular, Eh, pH and ionic concentrations. In addition, colour, form, crystallite size and the concentration of substituted cations in iron minerals can be used as quantifiable, pedogenic indicators. We report on the occurrence, genesis and properties of the wide range of iron minerals formed in soil profiles and associated ochreous precipitates from a variety of acid sulfate surface weathering environments in Australia. Specifically, the environments studied are mangrove swamp soils, non-tidal marsh soils and mine-spoil soils. These soils were chosen because they represent the range of weathering situations from stable (mangrove swamp soils) to non-stable rapid weathering (mine-spoil soils).

In undisturbed mangrove swamp soils the dominant Fe mineral is pyrite in the form of framboids and iron oxyhydroxide minerals seldom precipitate. This is indicative of strongly reducing conditions. In disturbed mangrove swamp soils iron oxyhydroxide minerals crystallise as thick precipitates.

In both undisturbed and disturbed mine-spoil soils, a wide variety of iron oxyhydroxides occur as prominent precipitates in bands of highly-variable colour ranging from bright-yellow to dark-reddish-brown. In addition to the "common" Fe minerals such as goethite, lepidocrocite, ferrihydrite and jarosite, the newly validated oxyhydroxysulfate mineral, schwertmannite, is found in mine-spoil soils. Schwertmannite is indicative of a weathering environment with solutions having a pH in the range 3 to 4 and sulfate concentrations between 1000 and 3000 $\mu\text{g/mL}$.

The non-tidal marsh soils occur in landscapes affected by seepage of sulfate and iron containing ground water and show properties intermediate between those of the mangrove swamp soils and mine-spoil soils. In these affected landscapes a small amount of pyrite is found in the reduced subsoil. At and near the soil surface a
