ABSTRACT

Nowadays it is assured that the fusion between the accounting and Information Technology (IT) fields provides an essential resource for businesses in all fields. However, as with every other integration between two different fields, some problems arise as a sub result for the fusion, rather than rationality and optimization, these problems and issues are recently solved through compromise. The goal of this paper is to looking at some of the problems and issues of accounting information systems as seen and pointed by Jordanian accountants, we will also be looking at some internal control issues. This is done by making a questionnaire appointed to a sample of accountants in Jordanian organization.

Keywords: AIS; Journal Control

1. INTRODUCTION

Accounting information is considered an essential resource for all organizations, such as the essence of all competitive businesses [5]. Accounting information systems' concept is very well established and many commercial packages and suitable systems have been developed. However, accounting systems have changing levels of efficiency and relatively high costs for such information, which affects the business world [14].

It has become an ordinary thought that most accounting information systems problems were the result of the lack of constructive planning to refresh their information systems in light of the vast progress that has been achieved in information technologies field, software quality, sophisticated system design and development, employment of quantitative models, identification of information needs, and proper systems auditing [11].

Internal control is generally defined to be the process put in place by management to provide reasonable assurance regarding the achievement of effective and efficient operations, reliable financial reporting, and compliance with laws and regulations [23].

Data integrity has been considered as part of the internal control framework with respect to financial statements auditing for external reporting. However, the greater objective in the business world is developing and maintaining a competitive advantage, and accurate financial reporting is only one part of that greater objective. Other parts may include cost and product leadership, quality, and speed of delivery, etc.

Internal control is considered a useful tool that helps achieving and extending all of these goals" [8]. Operations and upper management departments need information on sales quantities by territory, product type, and customer. Other information needs may also include production costs by department and product, inventory levels, accounts receivable and payable balances, cash flow projections, other non-financial performance indicators such as production utilization, material efficiency, on-time delivery, and so on. Long term success of a corporation essentially depends on good and active controls to provide information for internal decision making supporting company objectives.

2. PROBLEM

There are some problems that arise from the fusion of accounting and information technology (IT) fields in accountants' point of view, one of these problems is that computerized systems are at constant risk of hackers, power failures, viruses and loss of information.

Another issue is the relatively high cost of Accounting Information Expert systems, besides, these systems must be up to date, and usually, the firm's staff needs some sort of special training courses for effective use of the systems.

There are also some security issues that are mainly summarized with computer fraud risk.

Some pointed out that sometimes human error might not be identified as quickly, hence there must be some sort of validation for records input need for accuracy.

Sometimes there might be some difficulties in understanding accounting information systems' expert systems, and there must be some specified adaptation or set up for the business so it does not cause chaos to the accounts.

3. RELATED WORK

Although there are not that many studies and researches that looked at this topic for particular, it has been slightly mentioned and discussed in some articles and textbook.

In [7], the author listed some of the problems and issues of the accounting information systems, and gave a brief discussion about this topic.
