

The Philosophical Act

What does it mean to philosophize?

"We shall not begin with a definition of philosophy," says Fr. Ferriols SJ, in his essay "Insight." "Like all activities, philosophizing is something which is easier to do than to define." Fr. Ferriols introduces us to the act of philosophizing by discussing insight. He gives us examples of insight as seeing with the mind and the many ways of doing something with the insight.

When is an insight philosophical? Why do we philosophize? Robert O. Johann's "The Nature of Philosophical Inquiry" answers these questions. First he looks at experience as the shared interaction between the I as responsible agent and the other taken in its broad sense. This dynamic interaction is characterized by tension and incoherence. Inquiry is then the human being's effort to integrate, to bring harmony to this tension. Depending on tension, we have different kinds of inquiry: common sense, scientific, and philosophical. Common sense is our shared beliefs and practices that regulate our dealings with one another and with the environment. Scientific inquiry is called for when our common sense fails to resolve the tension in daily life. It looks at the world as means to consummatory experience. Philosophical inquiry goes beyond the scientific in that it inquires into "the coherence quality, 'sense' of human life itself as a comprehensive reality and final value."

"The act of questioning, of wanting to know, is the initiation to philosophy," says John F. Kavanaugh, S.J. And the first and fundamental question is none other than the self. Who am I? The question of the self leads to the question of "what am I to do?" (ethics) and to other questions, such as "what does it mean to know?" "An unexamined life is not worth living," says Socrates. To examine oneself is not introspecting, but takes into account the philosophical community and requires precision and discipline. For the pursuit of philosophy is truth, and truth liberates the self from stagnation and opens possibilities for one's self-project. The pursuit of truth is a process of questioning oneself in discourse with others in the past and the present. This is necessary in the task of self-becoming, in becoming a person.

In "Philosophy and the Just Man," philosophizing is also related to justice. Justice requires philosophy, for if justice means giving to the other what is due to him, it requires a reflection that is critical, holistic, and committed—which philosophy is. Philosophy requires justice, for truth as a value demands of the philosopher a testimony, a life guided by the truth.

When do we philosophize? Karl Jaspers in his book Way to Wisdom mentions three sources of philosophizing: wonder, doubt, and limit situation. Plato likens the philosopher to the poet in that both begin with wonder. Descartes is the classic example of philosophizing from doubting. The existentialist's search for meaning stems from his limit situation, a situation which one cannot escape from (e.g., the death of a beloved, failure in an exam). To these, Marcel adds metaphysical uneasiness. Metaphysical uneasiness is to be distinguished from mere curiosity, for here what one is unsure of is not something outside of oneself but within oneself.
