

CHAPTER 5

Food and feeding

About 75% of all bat species are insectivorous. Nevertheless, bats exhibit a great range of food and foraging behaviour. In the tropical and subtropical Old World from West Africa through to islands of the western Pacific one family of bats, the Phonopodidae or fruit bats of c.170 species, feed on fruit and flowers and sometimes on significant quantities of foliage. Similarly, in Central and South America a large part of the family of open-eared bats, again c.170 species, are mainly fruit and flower feeders. There is also a small number of bats that are largely carnivorous, including some that will take other bats, there are fish and crustacean feeders, and then there is the small group of three vampire bats of Central and South America that feed on blood. Indeed, there are no 'grazing' or 'terrestrial' bats, but otherwise the range of diet exhibited by bats pretty well matches other terrestrial mammals and the birds.

Special diets

For the insectivorous species, as we have seen, their ecological adaptation that varies from species to species and can be varied by the individual bat, gives bats mastery of the night sky and the wealth of insects and other invertebrates that are active at night. Some bats dart around after small midges and similar insects and will take about 2-3,000 insects per night. Other bats lead a more relaxed life using a 'feeding perch' to wait for a passing large beetle when, like a flycatcher, they will dart out and return to their perch with the prey. For convenience, the foraging behaviour of bats is divided into about five different strategies. Although most species will have a favoured foraging strategy, many

Two vampire bats in flight (Myotis species) and one on the ground (feeding over water) (see page 106).
