Anxiety The Cognitive Perspective:

Anxiety Michael W. Eysenck, 2013-05-24 Theorists are increasingly arguing that it is fruitful to approach anxiety from the cognitive perspective and the empirical evidence supports that contention The cognitive perspective is also adopted in this book but the approach represents a development and extension of earlier ones For example most previous theories and research have been based on anxiety either in clinical or in normal groups In contrast one of the central themes of this book is that there are great advantages to be gained from a joint consideration of clinical and normal anxiety Another theme of this book is that it is of major importance to establish whether or not there is a cognitive vulnerability factor which is associated with at least some forms of clinical anxiety It is argued with supporting evidence that there is a latent cognitive vulnerability factor for generalized anxiety disorder which manifests itself under stressful conditions This vulnerability factor is characterized by hypervigilance and is found predominantly in normals high in the personality dimension of trait anxiety The scope of the book extends to the effects of anxiety on performance and to the phenomenon of worry which is regarded as the cognitive component of anxiety In both cases a new theoretical framework is presented Correction notice In chapter 4 on pages 70 71 Christos Halkiopoulos should have been credited for his role as the inventor of the Dot Probe Paradigm and for the design and execution of the experiment discussed in Eysenck M W 1991 a Trait anxiety and cognition In C D Spielberger I G Sarason Z Kulczar and J Van Heck Eds Stress and Emotion Vol 14 London Hemisphere

Anxiety and Cognition

Michael Eysenck, 2014-01-21 It is argued in this book that there are three major approaches to anxiety First there is anxiety as an emotional state Second there is trait anxiety as a dimension of personality Third there is anxiety as a set of anxiety disorders What is attempted is to produce a unified theory of anxiety which integrates all these major approaches According to this unified theory there are four sources of information which influence the level of experienced anxiety 1 experimental stimulation 2 internal physiological activity 3 internal cognitions e g worries and 4 one's own behaviour The unified theory is essentially based on a cognitive approach More specifically it is assumed that individual differences in experienced anxiety between those high and low in trait anxiety depend largely on cognitive biases It is also assumed that the various anxiety disorders depend on cognitive biases and that the main anxiety disorders differ in terms of the source of information most affected by such biases e g social phobics have biased interpretation of their own behaviour In sum this book presents a general theory of anxiety from the cognitive perspective It is intended that this theory will influence theory and research on emotion personality and the anxiety disorders Correction notice Christos Halkiopoulos should have been credited for his role as the inventor of the Dot Probe Paradigm and for the design and execution of the experiment discussed in C D Spielberger I G Sarason Z Kulczar and J Van Heck Eds Stress and Emotion Vol 14 London Hemisphere
