P. J. Saju

Introduction

Family therapy represents a major conceptual shift in the approach to understanding and treatment of psychological disturbance and mental illness. Within this approach symptoms are understood as the consequence of disturbance in the functioning of the family as a whole, expressed by the individual with the manifest difficulty. An understanding of how the identified patient and family affect each other both positively and negatively can lead to effective family interventions.

This chapter will introduce the development of key ideas and schools of thought within family therapy as a treatment approach. The history of family therapy provides a fascinating mirror for changes in society; the emergence of different theoretical models and treatment techniques within it reflects changes in attitudes towards what constitutes a family, with a greater recognition of diversity and cultural variation, as well as revealing assumptions and value systems which need to be challenged as society continues to evolve and to change.

The main theoretical framework is referred to as systemic theory. This is also applicable as a model in mental health care more widely, due to its focus on the system as the whole and its understanding of the wider context within which psychological disturbance occurs. This chapter will end with a consideration of how systemic thinking is helpfully applied within psychiatric practice.

The Origins of Family Therapy

In the 1930s Alfred Adler, an Austrian doctor and psychotherapist, whose ideas diverged from Freud developed Individual Psychology, and saw children with their parents for the first time. In the early stages of family therapy, the theoretical model was largely based on psychoanalytical approaches and was driven by ideas about families having potentially pathogenic influences on individual members. In the late 1950s, pathological family functioning was suspected to be linked to schizophrenia. This focus generated a body of research looking at family interactions, and communication.

A key contributor in the history of family therapy was Gregory Bateson, an anthropologist and social scientist. In 1956 Bateson introduced the term 'double blind' communication, a term which refers to a contradiction between the different types of communications given out at the same time [1]. 'Digital' communication (verbal or written) may contradict with 'analogical' communication (non-verbal, gestures, tone of voice, facial expression etc.). A much-quoted example is of a mother who visits her son with schizophrenia in a hospital. He is glad to see her and puts his arm around her shoulders, in response to which she physically stiffens. Noticing this, he withdraws his
