Abstract: Today, Africa, particularly sub-Saharan Africa falls among the less- developed countries (LDCs) of the world. This view has been substantiated with different data from diverse research works. As the 21st Century is less than two decades old, what will be the fate of Africa at the end of the Century? Will the status-quo remain; or will there be hope for the continent to meet up with the challenges of development? Using the perspective of modernization theory of development, this paper highlights briefly the concept of economic development. It analyzes problems inhibiting African economic development, but differs from the views of the political economy theorists, by arguing that current problems of under development are due to internal socio-economic and political factors inherent in Africa. It examines prospects of African economic development in the 21st Century, and concludes by stressing that 'purposeful leadership' is the principal panacea to the question of Africa's economic development.

Keywords: Economic development; Sub-Saharan Africa; Problems; Prospects; and 21st Century.

I. INTRODUCTION

Much has been written by scholars from different disciplines, especially the Social Sciences and Humanities on the problem of economic development of Africa. Most of these works focused on the structure of political and economic relations between "dominant and dominated countries." Their underlying assumption (based on the political economy theories) was that the poverty of African countries is the out- come of a world-wide network of intrusion by the developed countries into Africa that commenced more than five centuries ago.

These scholars concluded that this intrusion led to the development of underdevelopment in Africa that has been sustained by these developed nations till date. For instance, the works of Ake (1983), Brett(1973), Falola(1987), Onimode(2000), and Rodney(1972), among many others, have blamed the present low level of African economic development on past centuries of unequal relationship between Africa and the developed countries of the world particularly Western European nations.

The general focus of their conclusion is based on "historical materialism", which implies a methodological review of the African past. Although, it is true that Africa had unequal relationship with Europe that led to the slave trade, imperialism and colonialism; but how has African states fared since the 1960s when most of them achieved their independence from foreign rule? The answer is obvious; Africa has not fared well, as its states fall among the underdeveloped or less-developed countries (LDCs) of the world. Thus despite political independence, the circle of poverty and underdevelopment remained the principal feature of Africa throughout the 20th century.

Specifically, towards the end of the last Century, a summary of the United Nations Development Programme's Human Development Index (HDI) of 1995 shows that, out of the six less- developed regions of the world, Sub-Saharan Africa scored the least percent (UNDP, 1996). Given the above scenario, this paper argues that Africa should stop bemoaning its past, because its current level of underdevelopment in the past five decades has been caused mainly by internal socio-economic and political problems within the continent.
