

African Nationalism as Colonial Legacy

 Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Introduction

The independence which Africa gained during the post-colonial period is primarily associated with the direction of African nationalism. However, researchers have argued that the continent's nationalist ideas focused on freedom and independence, ignoring the social needs of the population. Moreover, the new states adopted the models of the European systems without sufficient resources and infrastructure. Thus, African nationalism was not ideologically grounded and deliberate but focused on the short-term goal of liberation. However, the independence of the continent was the only possible option which could have been realized differently.

Flaws of African Nationalism

The nationalist movement to combat the colonial order in Africa was conceived on the European model. According to Davidson, the nation-state for the supporters of nationalism was "the harbinger of all democratic benefits that people could wish for." However, all African ideas about nation-state life were based on opposition to the colonial period, which was considered disastrous for the continent. Independence was perceived as the only way to eliminate the burden of imperialism. However, Africans were under colonial rule for a long time and lost sight of their national heritage. The division of Africa into sovereign states was planned by the former Empires, which developed their own policies.

The African desire for independence from the imperialists was expressed in the form of freedom from the legacy of colonialism. Davidson notes that promising nationalist ideas were lost due to "purely African irresponsibility or incompetence." African nationalism could be far-sighted if its ideologues were primarily focused on the needs of the African regions. The common aspiration of the nationalist movement was freedom from the colonial burden and not the transformation of former colonies into nations with their own values and sovereignty. Compared to the national liberation of the states of Central and Western Europe, African states did not have their own cultural identity. In the case of decolonization in European countries, one can talk
