
AFRICAN NATIONALISM IN SOUTH AFRICA

Yes, many factors led to the rise of African Nationalism in South Africa from 1900 to 1953. For example, the formation of the African People's Organisation (APO), the emergence of the South African National Natives Congress (SANNC), which was later renamed the African National Congress (ANC), the Industrial and Commercial Workers' Union (ICU), the influence of World War II and the Atlantic Charter and the formation of Congress Youth League (CYL). In this essay, the impact of these factors resulting in an upsurge/increase of African Nationalism in South Africa will be discussed.

African nationalism in South Africa started as a form of resistance to colonialism and segregation. Black South Africans supported Britain in the South African War (1899-1902) because they hoped that this would ensure better economic and political conditions, including an end to pass laws and the right to vote. However, Blacks were not the only group to face discrimination; people of colour also experienced injustice and exclusion from political life.

In 1902, after the South African War, a group of coloured South Africans formed the APO under the leadership of Dr Abdullah Abdurahman. APO was concerned primarily about the rights of "coloured" South Africans. They protested against the segregation laws and planned to exclude black South Africans from the right to vote. They sent a delegation to London to appeal to the British government to intervene. However, the British government ignored their request, and in May 1910, the Union of SA was formed under white control.

In reaction to the formation of the Union of SA, African nationalists led by John Dube, Pixley Seme and Sol Plaatje formed the SANNC in 1912, later renamed the ANC. They aimed to unite all Africans to oppose discrimination and to win political rights for all. In 1914 the SANNC sent a delegation to London to protest against the Native Land Act. However, they were unsuccessful. The ANC experienced some setbacks and was seen as representing the educated urban elite rather than the masses.

However, another organisation, the ICU, was formed in 1919 as a trade union amongst Cape Town dockworkers. It attracted the masses and played a leading role in organising protests against the
