Accounting for Automatic Data Processing Costs Needs Improvement United States. General Accounting Office, 1978 Automatic data processing is used extensively throughout the Government but many problems have been encountered in accounting for related costs Of 26 Federal data processing organizations reviewed none had adequate cost information on their automatic data processing assets and operations Major cost elements such as utilities space rental data transmission costs and military salaries were frequently omitted from reports of total costs Only about half of the organizations spread the costs of long lived hardware over its useful life and only a few did so for software Earlier GAO reviews noted examples of savings that could have resulted if proper cost data were available GAO and the Office of Management and Budget offered guidance in this area but it was not effectively followed Some factors accounting for this were changes in computer systems which can now serve many users financing of data processing operation by several different appropriations in some cases and the fact that data processing costs are only a portion of program costs and thus have not been separately identified It is essential to have reliable cost data in order to make sound decisions on needs for procurement to distribute costs properly when multiple users are involved and to make proper charges for services
