

to elements that do not recognise the linkages among the service sectors and within the formal and informal sectors that could promote productivity, create jobs and reduce poverty.

The institutional politics of development suffer from a lack of systemic approaches to urban development programmes where all necessary factors are considered for clear analysis and effective implementation of programmes. Politics have focussed on some factors and ignored others. A gap exists between development objectives and immediate actions; further, some of those who formulate urban development programmes are unaware of that gap. In Harris's words:

urban development has tended to exclude a concern for the underlying urban economy, making it impossible for city authorities to consider directly measures to enhance urban productivity. The agenda has been broadened from the immediate issues of maintaining order and providing services, to a concern with the environment of the poor. It needs now to consider the economy proper, particularly because increased administrative decentralization and a more open world economy are likely to make the role of city managers much more important (however these are identified). This will require considerable inputs of technical assistance, particularly to identify the city-specific agenda of issues and continuing mechanisms to monitor the changing economy. Hitherto, local authorities have had little incentive to trouble themselves about the economy within their administration. However, decentralization with greater democracy could enforce on local authorities an increasing interest in the sources of the city's revenues as well as the citizens' income.

Finally, this book is a very important addition to the literature on urban issues in developing countries, and to all concerned, whether professionals or academics, with the improvements that need to be brought to the processes of change and development in the Third World. The many voices reflected within the deliberations are rich in their contributions; they provide critical and valuable insights in the wide range of world-views from the perspectives of international agencies, national and local governments as well as academicians. For the interested readers, this reviewer suggests that they start with the Appendices to gain a familiarity with the host of participants and a basic understanding of the 1991 World Bank and UNDP new agenda documents; follow this by the Watts' paper, go to the "Introduction" and "The Discussion", and end with the Harris paper.

As every householder knows, property can be a source of concern as well as a measure of wealth. Time, effort and money must be expended regularly if a building is to maintain its value and provide its occupiers with a satisfactory environment. The task obviously demands technical skills, but even on this micro-scale some management must be involved if the work is to be planned and implemented economically and effectively. As the scale moves from micro to macro, so the problems multiply. Maintenance technology is therefore concerned with the technical requirements of investigating and diagnosing faults to assess condition; with the organisational needs to specify, select,
