

Madison Avenue

1940s–1960s

In this era of steel gray flannel suits, advertisers developed motivational research, grappled with television, and cooperated with government to promote American enterprise. Industry insiders, journalists, and the public criticized the crass and manipulative aspects of advertising. Firms began adding a few ethnic and racial minorities to their staffs. A creative revolution transformed advertising from conservative to hip, hokey to ironic.

A Friendly Face

Advertisers used friendly faces to connect with consumers. The iconic Coca-Cola Girl, the smiling Mr. Clean, and the friendly Mr. Goodenough were all designed to make products more relatable and trustworthy. These characters often became household names and played a significant role in the success of their respective brands.

Outdoor Advertising

Outdoor advertising, such as billboards and posters, became a major part of the advertising landscape. These large-scale visual messages were designed to capture attention and convey key information quickly and effectively. The era saw the rise of iconic outdoor advertisements, including the 'I Love My Country' poster and the 'We Can Do It!' poster.

Commercial Radio

Commercial radio became a dominant force in advertising during this period. Radio stations offered advertisers a direct line to a large, diverse audience. Popular radio shows and personalities, such as the 'Coca-Cola Singers' and the 'Mr. Goodenough' radio show, became major advertising vehicles. The era also saw the rise of radio personality-driven advertising, where hosts would promote products during their broadcasts.
