

How Vincent Bach Started in Business

By STEPHEN KEMP

CONDITIONS in the musical world are unsettled and somewhat uncertain. Epochal changes are in process. Reproduced music is displacing musicians in many theatres, and great activity is present among professional musicians, as to whether or not their livelihood is in complete jeopardy. It might be well to consider that changes similar in character have invaded practically every business, profession, and industry in the past, and that it has become an accepted principle among thinking men that such changes have invariably worked to the ultimate benefit of the persons affected, although only the passing of time demonstrates the manner and method of the improvement. At the first installation of automatic machinery, in fact machinery of every kind, the displaced workers raged against the innovations, but afterwards came to appreciate them. As musicians we can only see the direct curtailment of the use of orchestras now, and what the rest will be can hardly be predicted, but we are safe in believing that, as the photograph did not work the injuries at first anticipated, and as the radio has promoted the employment of musicians rather than curtailed their activities, we, over a period of time, will see the greatest development work out to the betterment of musical conditions. In the meantime, however, many players see themselves displaced and at the moment no relief is in sight. Thoughts are being turned to other employment, to entering into business, and to all possible means of increasing the income sharply reduced, or about to be eliminated entirely, by the new procedure. Under the circumstances, a little story about a business venture by one of our own kind will probably prove of interest; therefore we present a sketch of the efforts, discouragements, gradual accomplishment and final success of Vincent Bach, a great artist, a diligent worker and a master mechanic. One who raised himself from extremely modest financial beginnings to comparative affluence through intensive development of an article long given away by manufacturers, and helped as an unimportant accessory by the brass mouthpiece trade—the brass mouthpiece.

During Vincent Bach's engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra he had obtained a trumpet mouthpiece which seemed to meet every requirement of important artistic performance. His search for it had been continual in it by young and ambitious readers, we have had reprints made of it and copies will be sent free on request. —The Editor.

for years. While playing with the Russian Ballet Orchestra of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, he made the serious, although generous, error of lending his mouthpiece to a trumpet player friend who desired a duplicate for his own use. This over-cautious friend, when endeavoring to have the inside bore of the mouthpiece copied, hit upon a hole larger and different bore than that suited to him to be a marvelous improvement over Bach's mouthpiece. Thinking to surprise and please his friend Vincent, he had the bore of the original mouthpiece altered to accord with what he considered a very decided improvement. He surprised Bach, indeed, but far from pleased him. In fact, the mouthpiece was actually ruined and the search by Bach for a satisfactory one to replace it was again laboriously resumed.

Mouthpieces were purchased by the score, tried, changed and discarded. His entire leisure time, which was limited because of rehearsals, recordings, shows, and concerts, at least two hours daily practice for solo playing, was taken up in persistent efforts to find a satisfactory mouthpiece. From constant changing of mouthpieces, his endochrysalis was irritated and he really craved relief. When the war ended and he was discharged, he decided that the best step to take was to make a mouthpiece for himself, rather than to experiment with the products of workmen whose knowledge of the actual needs of musicians was meagre. From Mr. George M. Scherer, at that time Manager of the Scherer firm, of which firm he has become President, Bach obtained permission at first, a nominal cost to use one of the lathes in the Scherer (New York) repair shop. Mr. Bach's first efforts were confined to making the best cup shape, and after many experiments he succeeded in making one which enabled him to play tirelessly. But the problem of a bore was still unsolved. On some mouthpieces the upper register was brilliant and the lower notes dull; on others, pedal notes were full and round, while high notes were shrill and hard to produce. In time, however, Bach found the exact combination of cup and bore that seemed to him ideal. In his own playing, he used it exclusively and observed a remarkable improvement in his endochrysalis, but he still continued his experiments. He finally used the lather at Scherer's so constantly as to interfere with the work of the firm and was ultimately politely informed that the privilege granted him would have to be revoked. Having started, and still being absorbed in his experimental work, he rented a small room on the top floor of an old ramshackle building at 11 East 14th Street and in May, 1918, purchased a second-hand lathe and installed it in his new quarters. At that time Mr. Bach had not the slightest idea of entering into the manufacture of mouthpieces as a business. His sole desire was to make a perfect mouthpiece, duplicate it about a dozen times, and insure himself against any mouthpiece misfortunes in the future.

The operation of a lathe lather next to the roof on burning hot days can hardly be recommended as an indoor sport, and while Bach worked in his S. V. D.'s and tried many ways to keep cool, the strain was too great to bear. After he had completed twelve mouthpieces, with which he expected to meet all his future requirements, he sold the machine to an old-iron dealer, retained his most important tools, closed up his little shop and abandoned the manufacture of mouthpieces.

Emerson stated that if you build a better mousetrap than any one else, though you live in a wilderness, the world will beat a path to your door. The inherent truth of this principle was well illustrated in the case of Vincent Bach. At that particular time he was playing regularly in the Rivoli Theatre orchestra and frequently was demanded to play trumpet solos. Every musician noted the peculiar brilliancy and beauty of his tone and the minimum of effort with which he played. It attracted great attention and soon the word was passed around in musical circles that Bach had perfected a new and marvelous mouthpiece. Trumpet players immediately flocked to him, insisting that they be allowed to try his mouthpiece. After trials, they offered him large prices for his own, or an exactly similar mouthpiece. The price offered was as high as $20.00. Although reluctant to part with the accessories that had cost him such efforts to produce, he felt great sympathy for the trumpet players laboring with inferior mouthpieces, and one by one the precious few passed into other hands until only three remained. He definitely decided he would not part with the last three. In April, 1919, Bach was playing his usual daily visit to the musicians' headquarters on East 85th street, and was conversing with Mr. M. F. Seal, a clarinetist and a friend of long standing, who at that time was advertising writer for the Scherer firm. They were approached by a trumpet player who pleaded with Bach to sell one of his remaining mouthpieces. Bach refused emphatically as he had no wish to start in making mouthpieces again under the old conditions, and especially as he could not see good business in spending another $300.00 for a lathe. The trumpet player insisted,
