The House Stephen Gardiner,2002 The new edition of Stephen Gardiner s highly readable history of the house comes at a time of crisis in domestic architecture The author clearly shows how the collapse of traditional values since the Second World War has been mirrored by the new architectural emphasis on materialism bringing a disregard for the lessons of the past and a loss of contact both with human requirements and with nature as a source of inspiration He offers an enlightening overview of the development of house and home since the caves of early man and the rich profusion of indigenous styles that has since emerged from huts of mud and reeds Ziggurats Chinese underground villages with sunken courtyards multistoreyed tenements in Ancient Rome Japanese designs that blend with nature through the Palladian Arts and Crafts and more recently the rediscovery of a more human scale and the importance of the frame in particular in the designs of Le Corbusier and Frank Lloyd Wright After the later twentieth century s violent swings from tower blocks to Post Modernism and neo traditionalism we face a new danger the creeping sprawl that is swallowing up much of our beautiful countryside
