Batista,2009-12-03 The proper physiological functioning of most eukaryotic cells requires their assembly into multi cellular tissues that form organized organ systems Cells of the immune system develop in bone marrow and lymphoid organs but as the cells mature they leave these organs and circulate as single cells Antigen receptors TCRs of T cells search for membrane MHC proteins that are bound to peptides derived from infectious pathogens or cellular transformations The detection of such specific peptide MHC antigens initiates T cell activation adhesion and immune effectors functions Studies of normal and transformed T cell lines and of T cells from transgenic mice led to comprehensive understanding of the molecular basis of antigen receptor recognition and signaling In spite of these remarkable genetic and biochemical advances other key physiological mechanisms that participate in sensing and decoding the immune context to induce the appropriate cellular immune responses remain unresolved TCRrecognition is tightly regulated to trigger sensitive but balanced T cell responses that result in the effective elimination of the pathogens while minimizing collateral damage to the host The sensitivity of TCR recognition has to be properly tempered to prevent unintended activation by self peptide MHC complexes that cause autoimmune diseases It is likely that once the TCR is engaged by a peptide MHC and TCR signaling begins additional regulatory mechanisms involving other receptors would increase the delity of the response
