

PIONEERS

A girl, wanting to look nice and hot, repeatedly visited the tanning salon at different times of day. Soon she began feeling ill, and she consulted a doctor. He told her that she had cooked her insides. Version 2 from South Dakota claimed that she fried a muscle in an arm and that the limb had to be amputated.

Later the same day, a student from my summer folklore class reported a story that she had heard the night before. This supposedly happened, she said, to the wife of the cousin of the man who had told it to a woman friend of hers who then told her. Something like that.

This time the tanning salon had a rule to protect customers from overexposure: a forty-minute-per-day limit. But this girl—friend of a friend of a friend—circumvented that by signing up at five different salons, thus getting five times the recommended dosage.

My mother had discussed the story with another friend, who claimed that the tanning-salon ruse had really happened to a girl who was tanning herself into shape to be a model-looking bookend for her best pal.
