

The Effects of the Structural Adjustment Programs on Economic Growth in Sub-Saharan Africa: A Literature Review

Dr. Hasan Ahmed

LaGuardia Community College, The City University of New York, Latham, United States

ABSTRACT

Globalization has changed the political and economic map, but the benefits to different regions have been uneven. Sub-Saharan Africa (SSA) has undergone many economic struggles since achieving independence, and in the early 1980s SSA suffered a severe debt crisis. In response, the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank undertook the implementation of a trade liberalization policy through structural adjustment programs (SAPs) to ease the debt crisis in SSA. Three of these programs have involved the removal of agricultural subsidies, currency devaluation, and lowering tariffs on natural resources. However, despite the implementation of these programs, economic growth in SSA has been disappointing, and SAP programs earned a negative reputation because of these failures. In this literature review, we discuss studies conducted to analyze these programs. We have suggested further study to explore how these three SAP programs interrupted the economic growth of SSA in the long run, based on open-ended discussions with scholars who have researched the history and political economy of the region.

INTRODUCTION

Globalization has changed the political and economic map and has brought benefits to different regions at different levels (Andreano, Laureti, & Postiglione, 2013). The economic benefits of globalization are not always realized automatically. Its effects depend on how it is managed in a given country (Akinlo & Egbetunde, 2010). If financial liberalization is implemented without the simultaneous liberalization of other economic sectors, economic growth is often poor (R. O. Olusegun, Oluwaseyi, & Olusoji, 2013)

Sub-Saharan Africa (SSA) has undergone many economic struggles since acquiring independence from the European colonial powers. Prior to the 1980s, economic development in SSA was good, but in the early 1980s, SSA faced a severe debt crisis (Bristol, 2012). International bodies such as the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank made efforts to ease this debt crisis by prescribing a trade liberalization program. The program was designed under the Washington Consensus, a policy created by the World Bank, the IMF, and the U.S. government attaching a set of conditions for developing countries to access loans from the World Bank and the IMF (Falvey et al., 2012; Nichols, 2011). The initial aim of the SAPs was to liberalize trade policy and to "get the prices right" for SSA products (Bryceson, 2002; Gladwin, 1992). Many such World Bank programs, called structural adjustment programs (SAPs), were created (Bartels et al., 2013; Majekodunmi & Adejuwon, 2012).

SSA needs effective and innovative ways to integrate into the global economy (Fosu, 2011). However, nationalistic and protectionist attitudes have impeded globalization in the SS, and the participation of many SSA nations in global activities during the postcolonial era has been minimal ((Ndulu & O'Connell, 2008; Otiso, Derudder, Bassens, Devriendt, & Wiltex, 2011). Of the factors that have impeded economic growth in SSA through globalization, researchers have identified the SAPs, implemented by the IMF and the World Bank, most prominently.
