Recent Advances in Research on Down Syndrome Poulami Majumder,2015 Down syndrome DS or trisomy 21 is one of the most important genetic causes of mental retardation Sincere and significant attempts have been made towards understanding the congenital diseases that affect DS patients Better understanding of gene networks associated with such malformations will help to predict the complex genetic trait behind congenital disease in DS and will also provide the basis for tailored gene therapies that could begin to heal or prevent such malformation without the need to resort to invasive surgery Further susceptible mutation screening in women will also be helpful for both prenatal diagnosis of DS birth and assessing the risk of predisposition to Alzheimer s disease and congenital heart disease Stress condition and neurodegeneration are two important markers in Down syndrome patients and mtDNA variation can also be used as an important biomarker It has been suggested that nutraceuticals which reduce reactive oxygen species ROS level may be used to treat trisomy 21 condition As mitochondria play a crucial role in the regulation of free radicals only a detail analysis will reveal the origin of phenotypic characteristics among trisomy 21 DS patients On the other hand several mechanisms are responsible for neurodegeneration as well as altered cognition It includes impaired neurogenesis leading to hypocellularity in the cortex hippocampus and cerebellum altered dendritic morphology altered synapses increased inhibition and neurodegeneration The new knowledge of the pathogenic mechanisms in DS individuals has been acquired from mouse model These studies provide the basis for developing new drugs for clinical trials in DS individuals and to sustain the hope that some of these drugs will be useful in treating intellectual disability in DS individuals
