

The eighteenth century periodica essays.

"If any literary form is the particular creation and the particular mirror of the Augustan Age in England it is the Periodical Essay."

-A.R Humphrey

The eighteenth century society conceived a new literary form that helped to shape the whole sphere of literature of this period, the periodical essay. It is one of the most important gifts of this "excellent and indispensable" age, which perfectly reflects the society and its thoughts.

Fundamentally this new genre was in perfect harmony with the spirit of the age. It sensitively combined the tastes of the different classes of readers and became very popular among the resurgent middle classes. They welcomed it as the "light" literature and praised its brevity, common sense approach and tendency to dilute morality and philosophy. To a great extent the periodical essayists assumed the office of the clergyman and taught the lesson of elegance and refinement to the masses, including the growing number of female readers.

This growing popularity of the new literary genre attracted many essayists to this, but it first flourished in the hands of Richard Steele and Joseph Addison, who brought it to perfection and established it as a strong literary form. They are considered as the twin forces behind the phenomenal development of English prose in this period. In fact, the formal properties of the periodical essay were largely defined through the practice of these two genius in their two most widely read periodicals – The Tatler (1709-11) & The Spectator (1711-12,14).

The Tatler:-

It was Richard Steele's The Tatler, which began the deluge of the Periodical essays which followed. The first issue of this periodical appeared on April 12, 1709 and published thrice on a week- Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays. The purpose of this periodical was to "offer something, where by such
