Digital Audio Restoration:

Digital Audio Restoration Simon J. Godsill, Peter J.W. Rayner, 2013-12-21 The application of digital signal processing DSP to problems in audio has been an area of growing importance since the pioneering DSP work of the 1960s and 70s In the 1980s DSP micro chips became sufficiently powerful to handle the complex processing operations required for sound restoration in real time or close to real time This led to the first commercially available restoration systems with companies such as CEDAR Audio Ltd in the UK and Sonic Solutions in the US selling dedicated systems world wide to recording studios broadcasting companies media archives and film studios Vast amounts of important audio material ranging from historic recordings of the last century to relatively recent recordings on analogue or even digital tape media were noise reduced and re released on CD for the increasingly quality conscious music enthusiast Indeed the first restorations were a revelation in that clicks crackles and hiss could for the first time be almost completely eliminated from recordings which might otherwise be unreleasable in CD format Until recently however digital audio processing has required high powered computational engines which were only available to large institutions who could afford to use the sophisticated digital remastering technology With the advent of compact disc and other digital audio formats followed by the increased accessibility of home computing digital audio processing is now available to anyone who owns a PC with sound card and will be of increasing importance in association with digital video as the multimedia revolution continues into the next millennium

Digital Audio Restoration S.J. Godsill, Digital Audio Restoration of Gramophone Records Christoph Frank Stallmann, 2015 Gramophones were the main audio recording medium for more than seven decades and regained widespread popularity over the past few years Being an analogue storage medium gramophone records are subject to distortions caused by scratches dust particles high temperatures excessive playback and other noise induced by mishandling the record Due to the early adoption of the compact disc and other digital audio mediums most research to reduce the noise on gramophone records focused on physical improvements such as the enhancements of turntable hardware amelioration of the record material or advances through better record cutting techniques Comparatively little research has been conducted to digitally filter and reconstruct distorted gramophone recordings This thesis provides an extensive analysis on the digital detection and reconstruction of noise in gramophone audio signals distorted by scratches The ability to approximate audio signals was examined through an empirical analysis of different polynomials and time series models The investigated polynomials include the standard Fourier Newton Lagrange Hermite osculating and piecewise polynomials Experiments were also conducted by applying autoregressive moving average and heteroskedasticity models such as the AR MA ARMA ARIMA ARCH and GARCH models In addition different variants of an artificial neural network were tested and compared to the time series models Noise detection was performed using algorithms based on the standard score median absolute deviation Mahalanobis distance nearest neighbour mean absolute spectral deviation and the absolute predictive deviation method The reconstruction process employed the examined polynomials and models and also considered adjacent window mirroring window nearest neighbour similarity Lanczos and cosine interpolation The detection and reconstruction algorithms were benchmarked using a dataset of 800 songs from eight different genres Simulations were conducted using artificially generated and real gramophone noise The algorithms were compared according to their detection and reconstruction accuracy the computational time needed and the tradeoff between the accuracy and time Empirical analysis showed that the highest noise detection accuracy was achieved with the absolute predictive deviation using an ARIMA model The predictive outlier detector employing a Jordan simple recurrent artificial neural network was most efficient by achieving the best detection rate in a limited timespan It was also found that the artificial neural networks reconstructed the audio signals more accurately than the other interpolation algorithms The AR model was most efficient by achieving the best tradeoff between the execution time and the interpolation error

Handbook of Signal Processing in Acoustics David Havelock, Sonoko Kuwano, Michael Vorländer, 2008-10-26 The Handbook of Signal Processing in Acoustics brings together a wide range of perspectives from over 100 authors to reveal the interdisciplinary nature of the subject It brings the key issues from both acoustics and signal processing into perspective and is a unique resource for experts and practitioners alike to find new ideas and techniques within the diversity of signal processing in acoustics

Axmedis 2008 Jaime Delgado, Paolo Nesi, 2008 The present book covers topics both on fluvial and lagoon morphodynamics The first part is dedicated to tidal environments Topics include an overview of main morphological features and mechanisms of estuaries and tidal channels and a model devoted to investigate flow field pattern and bed topography in tidal meandering channels and a comparison with recent observational evidence of meanders within different tidal environments The general failure of Bagnold hypothesis when applied to equilibrium bedload transport at even relatively modest transverse slope is demonstrated A new model is then proposed based on an empirical entrainment formulation of bed grains
