COURSE DESCRIPTION:

This course is an introductory undergraduate course to familiarize students basic tools for understanding the economy. Object of this course is to let students understand how consumers, firms and government policy makers make economic decisions; what an unregulated market economy does well and what it does poorly; and what role government action should play in economic affairs. Students Time permitting, environmental issues involving pollution, externalities, market failure and economic incentives for pollution control will be emphasized. ECON160A, 160B, 160C and 160D are all equivalent for the purpose of satisfying prerequisites and economics major requirements. This course also fulfills general education requirements as Social Sciences (N) for both major and non-major students.

LEARNING OUTCOMES:

Principles of Microeconomics is a Gen Ed "N" course. Students in N courses will demonstrate knowledge of major concepts, models, and issues (and their interrelationships) of at least one of the social sciences: anthropology, economics, geography, history, political science, or sociology.

On successful completion of this course, you will be able to use the framework of basic microeconomic models to recognize, understand and interpret the economic phenomena that you observe every day. The analytical tools and skills developed in the course are used to understand the consequences of different market regimes and relate these concepts to public policy relevant to the real economy. These tools of economic reasoning developed by students throughout the term can be applied in daily life decisions and should enable them to form their own judgement
