

across the continent? Or did some travel on boats along the Pacific Coast, carrying the Americas from primary lander vessels? We don't know for sure, but there is little doubt that most of the first Americans came from Northeast Asia. They established societies here long before Christopher Columbus "discovered" America.

Eventually, humans disappeared due to rising ocean levels. The new people of the Americas became cut off from Asia as well as from the European and African continents, due to rising oceanic America's barrier. By the time of Columbus's arrival in the late 1490s, the Americas had hundreds of indigenous societies with different religions, languages, and governments. These societies did not see themselves as "Indians"—that name would have made no sense to their disparate tribes. It was Europeans who lumped all Native American people together as one common ethnicity.

Native Americans and the “Three Sides” of Farming

The earliest Native Americans were nomadic and hunted massive mammals with stone-tipped spears that were the great mammals that had just re-evolving and climate change. The first kinds of prey included mammoths, caribou, and giant ground sloths that could weigh up to a ton. Now the humans were also smaller animals, some combinations of water-tough game (fish, lake, and gathered seeds, nuts, and berries). But the critical change came with the switch to agriculture around 5000 BC. Crops in Mexico have yielded some early evidence have dated at 4000 years old, as you know.

Corn, squash, and beans—the “three sisters”—were the cornerstone of ancient Native American agriculture. This was especially the case in Central America, where great societies, including the Maya and the Mexican “pre-Columbian,” called “Aztecs,” by Europeans derived an early crop.

Farming and its accompanying surplus allowed the Maya and Mexican to have a deeper cultural surplus than hunter-gatherers had. These populations grew, they developed written languages, and they left impressive works of art and architecture. Much of the cultural heritage was significant in Mexico and Mexican tribal religions. Around AD 800, a Maya culture (Maya) and discovered a way for “domesticated” human beings in the Yucatan of the Maya. Maya figures on the central aspect (highly levels of the ancient, and an inscription explains that the god who “gave the open space to plant the great Jaguar Night the plant, the Black Iced Land, the Sun Iced Land.”

Agriculture, particularly the cultivation of corn, spread westward into the Americas Southwest shortly after the time of Christ. By about AD 1000, major Native American farming settlements had sprung up in the Southwest (in modern-day New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, and Colorado). Showcasing their prodigious technological skills, the Aztecs and other Southwest Indians built impressive (AD) dwellings and apartment-like pyramids, including the massive, multi-story Pyramid of Cholula in Cholula, New Mexico. This pyramid required 10,000 tons of volcanic blocks to build. The Aztecs also constructed vast networks of irrigation channels to sustain their farms in the arid environment. But extended drought conditions as well as aggression by other native groups led to the demise of the Aztecs by about AD 1500.

The Mound Builders

Native settlements also spread up the length of the Mississippi River Valley. Many early Indians created remarkably massive mounds that continue to mark the landscape today. Among the most impressive, and oldest, were at Poverty Point, in Louisiana. Construction began there around 1400 BC. Poverty Point’s “Bird Mound,” named for its shape, made mounds two feet high, jutting about 40 feet surrounding the Mississippi Delta. Recent discoveries suggest that this structure, perhaps the mound
