

J. V. Falke's Lebenserinnerungen an eine Reise nach Irland (page 271) furnishes an exceptionally good example of "representation through the opposite" in which the use of words of a double meaning plays absolutely no part. The scene is laid in a wax figure museum like Mme. Tussaud's. A lecturer discourses on one figure after another to his audience which is composed of old and young people. "This is the Duke of Wellington and his horse," he says. Whereupon a young girl remarks, "Which the duke and which is the horse?" "Just as you like, my pretty child," the reply. "You pay your money and you take your choice."
