Abstract

Objectives. Patients' involvement in the decision-making process is essential for shared decision-making and optimal patient-centered care. However, when there are concerns about a patient's cognition and judgment, the complexity of providing patient-centered care increases. It is often necessary to evaluate patients' decision-making capacity (DMC) to determine whether they are able to make a particular decision or whether to rely on their previously expressed wishes or the patient's caregivers.

Methods. In this article, we present a case of an older adult with colon cancer who presented to the emergency room.

Results. We describe how multidisciplinary care can enhance the evaluation of DMC and improve quality of care for older patients with advanced cancer.

Significance of results. Multidisciplinary discussions and good communication skills are essential for navigating these complex situations, reducing potential harm and maximizing quality of life.

Shared decision-making (SDM) in older adults with cancer is a complex endeavor. In addition to the patient's wishes and beliefs, numerous factors including cognitive decline, frailty, comorbidities, polypharmacy, and sensory impairment greatly influence treatment decision-making. This is particularly challenging when older adults have difficulties making decisions about their medical care. SDM, a process in which the clinician works in collaboration with the patient to make decisions about clinical care that is consistent with the patient's preferences, goals, and values, is a key element of patient-centered care (Scholl et al., 2014; Shickh et al., 2023; Zhou et al., 2023). However, when there is concern about a patient's cognition or judgment, it is essential to evaluate decision-making capacity (DMC) and may be necessary to rely on patients' caregivers or previously expressed wishes if patients are unable to demonstrate this.

DMC is an adult patient's ability to understand and process information about their diagnosis, prognosis, and treatment options. Persons with DMC are able to weigh the relative benefits, burdens, and risks of therapeutic options; manipulate medical information in a manner to make treatment choices aligned with personal values; and communicate a consistent choice regarding the decision (Appelbaum and Grisso 1988). Importantly, DMC is specific to a particular decision.

Decisional incapacity is often underrecognized in older adults, and the decision to assess capacity varies depending on the clinician and care environment (Gan et al., 2023; Sessums et al., 2011). The capacity assessment process must account for the serious consequences of consenting to or refusing treatment and should involve consultation with relevant clinical experts (McFarland et al., 2020). While efforts are being made to standardize DMC assessment practices, the process can be optimized by incorporating the perspectives of clinicians from multiple disciplines that have relevant expertise (Charles et al., 2021; National Institute for Health and Care Excellence 2018; Seyfried et al., 2013). We describe the case of an older patient with advanced cancer who presented with a recurrent theme: the difficulties clinicians encounter during SDM, especially when the older adult is cognitively impaired. It illustrates how those difficulties affect the quality of care and may prevent the clinician from paying attention to what matters most to the patient.
