Reducing Race Differences in Direct-to-Consumer Pharmaceutical Advertising Stephany De Scisciolo, Teresa L. Scheid, 2018-08-31 Reducing health disparities by increasing access to health information is a national health policy priority Evidence exists that direct to consumer pharmaceutical advertising DTCA is effective in educating consumers about health issues However racial disparities exist in such advertising In 2009 the Food and Drug Administration FDA issued a report that included recommendations for enhancing the ability of DTCA to reach disadvantaged populations including racial and ethnic minorities Reducing Race Differences in Direct to Consumer Pharmaceutical Advertising compares the pharmaceutical advertisements placed in five popular women s magazines published prior to and following the 2009 FDA report to assess the impact of these recommendations on the content and appearance of advertisements placed in magazines of differing racial orientation From a health policy perspective the results are disappointing The FDA recommendations had no impact on the frequency or content of the DTCA appearing in White oriented versus Black oriented magazines In fact far fewer drugs used to treat life threatening conditions were advertised in Black oriented magazines after the 2009 FDA recommendations The book concludes that enhancing the educational and motivational value of DTCA will require more than a set of recommendations The results shed light on the pharmaceutical industry s compliance with both hard and soft regulation Neither federal recommendations nor industry guidelines resulted in the changes to DTCA envisioned by the FDA Regulatory action is necessary to ensure that pharmaceutical companies develop advertising campaigns that not only promote their products but also positively impact the health outcomes of those who read their ads
