Abstract: This research assessed the implementation of differentiated instruction in relation to students' academic performance. The researchers used the descriptive research method to gather information about the respondents' demographic profile. The data obtained were analyzed using percentage weighted mean, significant relationship for the on the teaching styles and learners' academic performance utilizing 0.05 level of significance. Finding reveals that in terms of learning and teaching styles, it uncovers a strong preference for visual, auditory, kinesthetic, and reading/writing approaches among learners, and flexibility in instruction, individualized instruction, and differentiated instruction among teachers. A correlation is observed between these teaching styles and improved performance in English, Science, and Math. Lastly, the study identifies time constraints and resource limitations as the most pressing issues faced by teachers. This research underscores the critical role of differentiated instruction in enhancing academic outcomes and highlights the need for addressing teachers' concerns to further optimize teaching efficacy.
