Summary

Since the 1950s, the United Nations (UN) has designated days (e.g., World Wetland Day), years (e.g., Year of the Gorilla) and decades (e.g., Decade on Biodiversity) with a commonly stated goal to raise awareness and funding for conservation-oriented initiatives, and these Days, Years and Decades of '...' (hereafter 'DYDOs') continue. However, the effectiveness of these initiatives to achieve their stated objectives and to contribute to positive conservation outcomes is unclear. Here we used a binary analysis change model to evaluate the effectiveness of UN conservation-oriented DYDOs observed between 1974 and 2020. We also examined four case studies to understand the different strategies employed to meet specified conservation goals. We found that DYDOs apparently contributed to positive conservation outcomes when they were tied to social media campaigns and/or when they were strategically situated in current events or global discourse. Although the outcomes of DYDOs were varied, those with longer timescales and those that engaged local communities were more likely to be successful. We suggest that DYDO organizers should identify all possible paths of action through the lens of the change model outlined in this paper to strengthen the value and effectiveness of these initiatives in the future. Using this approach could help ensure that resources are used efficiently and effectively, and that initiatives yield positive conservation outcomes that benefit people and nature.

Introduction

The United Nations (UN) is the most widely recognized and prominent organization when it comes to initiating 'Day/Year/Decade of' (hereafter 'DYDO') observances. Today, keeping up with the UN's international observances can feel like a daunting task, especially when also taking into consideration initiatives implemented by non-governmental organizations (NGOs) such as World Wildlife Fund's (WWF) International Year of the Polar Bear, as well as those promoted by social and humanitarian NGOs and governments (e.g., Black History Month).

The first initiative endorsed by the UN General Assembly (193 Member States as of 2021) was World Refugee Year in 1959 (United Nations 2021). There have since been 327 DYDOs implemented with varying themes by various UN organizations (e.g., UN Environmental Programme, UN Education, Scientific and Cultural Organization, UN Food and Agriculture Organization), but each is linked to at least one UN priority area and foundational purpose of promoting international peace, protecting human rights and ensuring sustainable development (United Nations 2021). Multiple DYDOs can be proposed within any given year, but the adoption of a DYDO occurs when the proposed subject is passed through the UN General Assembly and voted into inception by UN Member States. These initiatives set out to capture timely events or topics and to encourage international awareness and action including fundraising to address concerns that have global implications (United Nations n.d.a); topics have been wide ranging, from assuring the rights and well-being of persons with disabilities to conserving freshwater ecosystems. Through these international initiatives, the UN aims to mobilize political will and collaborative action among stakeholders, citizens and governments (United Nations n.d.a). Yet, as the number of DYDOs increases, it is pertinent to ask: what are the realized real-world impacts of these initiatives? And how are such accomplishments measured?

This question is especially relevant because time, funding and human resources are all required for a DYDO campaign, which risks audience fatigue. The goals and intentions of these
