

Design is a process that requires freedom and rigour, experience and focus. But how can a place be transformed through a lengthy, meaningful quest?

The insightful guide from award-winning architect Teresa Lu offers an insider's view of a proven framework for architecture design. It breaks down the design process into four essential stages: Asking, Looking, Playing and Making. As a nature-focused storytelling model that questions, debunks and simplifies complex professionalities, it reveals how a design process can generate buildings that are rooted in a sense of place. It focuses on human relationships with nature, drawing principles from nature as the basis for design.

Asking, Looking, Playing and Making is applied by Teresa Lu to all her studio's projects, from design competitions to completed works. Case studies of six built projects show how the framework works in practice and include the Singing Playing Tree, Tower of Light and York Master Heritage Quay.

A story glimpsed into the process of creating a truly sustainable architecture.
