

A LOST COMMANDER
FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE

BY

Mary Raymond Shipman Andrews

"It is as important," said Florence Nightingale, "for a woman to be a person." And it is the "person," the vivid, vigorous, sensible woman that Mary Raymond Shipman Andrews has drawn.

In a day when nursing was synonymous with strong drink, and all that was expected of the profession was the knowledge of how to make a poultice, Florence Nightingale, young, wealthy, petted, destined to be a Victorian beauty, broke away from her family to train in an obscure little shack in Germany which had been founded as an asylum for discharged female prisoners, the only training school in Europe. When she returned to England she won the interest of Sidney Pembroke who was her courageous friend throughout those years when it took courage to be a friend of Florence Nightingale.
