

A Humanistic Approach to Teacher Education'

The recent increase in dissent among students in schools at all levels should provide a stimulus for those charged with program development in teacher-training institutions to reevaluate their efforts. Students are saying that they are bored with school, feel they are just putting in time, and are getting tired of waiting for an exciting class so that they can get through the day. This should force those responsible for program development in teacher-training institutions to ask some relevant questions:

- (1) To what extent are they training teachers to stifle curious, knowledgeable, and thoughtful students?
- (2) To what extent are teachers being trained to turn out students who are mass producers of rote learning?
- (3) To what extent are teachers being trained to become totalitarians in the classroom?

1. Complete information about this program can be obtained by writing the College of Human Resources and Education, West Virginia University.

Dr. Iannone is professor of education, and Dr. Carline is chairman, Department of Curriculum and Instruction, West Virginia University, Morgantown.

- (4) To what extent is today's teacher training obsolete for today's youth?

If those responsible realistically evaluate themselves in the light of these questions, they should come to the conclusion that there is drastic need for reform in their teacher-training practices. It is our belief that the major problem underlying the above questions is related to the way teacher-training institutions have neglected human learning experiences for prospective teachers; that is, they have failed to recognize that teaching is primarily concerned with human beings interacting with each other in a very human process.

The role of teacher as answer giver or cultural transmitter is no longer relevant; this renaissance concept of a teacher must be changed to meet the more human needs of today's youth. Many teacher-training institutions are producing humanly illiterate teachers who are not able to cope with a rising generation of youth attuned to human encounters; a new teacher who is human and real needs to be born, one who can integrate the skills of teaching into his life-style and help students grow not only intellectually but also as human beings. Most important, this human teacher must
