

Overview of the Spaulding Classification

- Spaulding recognized that the need for disinfection of equipment in medical settings ranged from non-critical to semi-critical to critical, depending on the likelihood of spreading disease.
- For example, sterilization is necessary for equipment that comes into contact with a patient's bloodstream or sterile tissue. This category of equipment, such as surgical knives, is designated "critical" because it presents a high risk of disease transmission from patient to patient.
- Equipment that only touches healthy, unbroken skin presents a low risk of contamination because intact skin acts as an effective barrier to most microorganisms. Examples in this "non-critical" category include bedpans, blood-pressure cuffs, and bedrails.
- In between those two scenarios, a "semi-critical" level of disinfection presents a medium risk of contamination. This would include equipment such as endoscopes used on mucous membranes or areas of broken skin.
