Conceiving Normalcy Elizabeth C. Britt, 2001-07-24 This ground breaking rhetorical analysis examines a 1987 Massachusetts law affecting infertility treatment and the cultural context that makes such a law possible Elizabeth C Britt uses a Massachusetts statute requiring insurance coverage for infertility as a lens through which the work of rhetoric in complex cultural processes can be better understood Countering the commonsensical notion that mandatory insurance coverage functions primarily to relieve the problem of infertility Britt argues instead that the coverage serves to expose its contours Britt finds that the mandate operating as a technology of normalization helps to identify the abnormal the infertile and to create procedures by which the abnormal can be subjected to reform In its role in normalizing processes the mandate is more successful when it sustains rather than resolves the distinction between the normal and the abnormal This distinction is achieved in part by the rhetorical mechanism of the double bind For the middle class white women who are primarily served by the mandate these double binds are created both by the desire for success control and order and by adherence to medical models that often frustrate these same desires The resulting double binds help to create and sustain the tension between fertility and infertility order and discontinuity control and chaos success and failure tensions that are essential for the process of normalization to continue Britt uses extensive interviews with women undergoing fertility treatments to provide the foundation for her detailed analysis While her study focuses on the example of infertility it is also more broadly a commentary on the power of definition to frame experience on the burdens and responsibilities of belonging to social collectives and on the ability of rhetorical criticism to interrogate cultural formations
