A B S T R A C T

Anorexia nervosa (AN) is an eating disorder characterised by self-restriction of food intake fearing weight gain. This psychological disorder is diagnosed as per DSM-V criteria. However, this psychological disorder is known to coexist with medical conditions. Treatment of the associated medical condition is essential for the successful management of AN cases. Here, we present a case of Graves' disease coexisting with AN which was successfully managed with antithyroid medications and psychoeducation.

Keywords: Anorexia Nervosa, Graves' Disease, Adolescent

Introduction

Adolescence is a period of tremendous psychosocial and emotional changes and is often associated with body image concerns. Eating disorders are common among them and are being readily diagnosed. Anorexia nervosa (AN) refers to a powerful fatal psychological eating disorder characterised by extreme reduction in amount of food eaten, acute panic of putting on weight and disfigured body shape.<sup>1</sup> It is important to identify medical disorders that mimic AN as misdiagnosis causes treatment delay, unnecessary medical costs, and potential complications. In this case report, we want to emphasise the fact that even after a diagnosis of an eating disorder like AN is made, we have to look beyond it. Recently we managed an adolescent who was diagnosed with AN based on DSM-V criteria. But we looked beyond it and we could diagnose co-existing Graves' disease.

Case Report

A 14-year-old adolescent girl had normal developmental features when she was brought with complaints of progressive decrease in appetite and weight for the past 3 months. She revealed no inherent symptoms. Her menses began 1 year ago but she was suffering from hypomenorrhea. She was ridiculed by her friends for her plump body which resulted in her obsession with her body shape and slowly her food intake decreased.

On examination, she was expressive as well as vigilant.
