ABSTRACT

Translation was initially studied as a linguistic phenomenon and, accordingly, Translation Studies (TS) was conceived as a linguistic discipline. The past twenty years or so have seen the focus of (TS) shift away from linguistics and increasingly to forms of cultural studies. The purpose of the present study is three-fold. First, on the grounds of the conviction that linguistic theory has more to offer to translation theory than is so far recognized, this study aims to show the interrelationships between linguistics and (TS). Second, because there has been a great focus on using English only as a medium of instruction in all courses taught in the United Arab Emirates University, this study attempts to answer the questions, 'how much translation is permitted in foreign language teaching?', and 'what are the factors that determine the quantity to be used?'. Third, it attempts to give some indication of the kind of work that has been done so far in (TS) within the framework of cultural studies.

The discussion in the present study proceeds primarily from the perspectives of (TS): Applied Linguistics and Second Language Acquisition Research. It argues that inside or between languages, human communication equals translation, and a study of translation is a study of language. Moreover, disregarding L₂ learners' native language and considering it 'a bogey to be shunned at all costs' is a myth. Relatedly, providing maximum exposure to the foreign language may help in learning that language but, sometimes, at the expense of understanding and intelligibility.

Keywords: Translation Studies, Linguistic Approaches, Cultural Studies, Translation in Foreign Language Teaching.
