The Dance on the Feet of Chance Hooman Attar, 2010-12-02 Corporations have problems dealing with the indeterminate aspects of innovation particularly in the early fuzzy front end of the process They have difficulty in reflecting upon and handling uncertainties of innovation often exhibiting a dynamic conservatism or a set of defensive routines that inhibit inquiry about such contentious issues They prefer and are better equipped to operate within the language of investment than the language of invention In the language of investment corporations select an environmental niche and attempt to program and fabricate its future according to rational stable assumptions and formulations This view is closely bound to a utopian image of risk management as a tool able to objectively map measure and monitor future uncertainties that govern the behavior of the chosen niche By seeking a close and clear fit between risk management solutions means and the dominant factors that determine future threats and opportunities to the niche environment ends corporations attempt to master risks and colonize the future through an orderly process It is the argument of this book that this approach is only good when targeting and solving well defined problems of risk management and innovation within an intellectual terrain that has already been intellectually set It fails to systematically recognize reflect upon and improve the effectiveness of the complex and creative task undertaken in the prior stage of problem setting or risk settling In contrast to this approach it is argued that in ill defined unique and uncertain situations problem setting or risk settlement are the key primary activities and problem solving or risk management only secondary This study as its strategic objective seeks to juxtapose these contrasting views and develop an integrated conceptual framework capable of supporting a reflective practice amongst practitioners grappling with the interplay between risk settlement and risk management at the fuzzy front end of innovation This framework strongly influenced by Donald Sch n s scholarly work takes the form of a set of concepts designed to synthesize mobilize and focus a wide range of academic literature on managing risk and handling uncertainty in product innovation It informs reflections on professional practice through pragmatist existential explorations of the role of metaphor in basic thinking processes as well as sociopolitical and psychological insights into the factors influencing how practitioners intuitively transform and translate uncertain unmanageable realities into packages of manageable problems converting uncertainty into manageable risks and rewards In seeking to understand reflect upon and improve the way in which such a conversion process within the practice of risk settlement works it is argued that it is useful to view it as having four dimensions undertaking spontaneous and reciprocal reflections coping with anxiety use of metaphors and use of frames and framing The study applies this framework and understanding to an empirical study of risk management and product innovation in the Australian Cooperative Research Centres CRC programme A narrative reconstruction of critical events occurring in a series of R D projects in the CRCs is used to elucidate elaborate and illustrate the conceptual framework that has been developed as both a contribution to risk management thought and at least in prototype as a guide for reflective practice The framework and its illustration is designed to support practical reflection on the complexities of problem setting risk settlement and the non rational character of generative metaphors and the practice of invention In the introduction I point to the increasing rate of uncertain unique and complex problems as they affect professionals organizations involved in innovation and modern institutions as a whole This situati
