
Analyse Aristotle's Four Causes

In attempting to explain why things exist, Aristotle asserts as part of his four causes that all things which exist have a final cause, or a reason/purpose for existing (denoted by the Greek word 'telos'). He goes further to claim that things which are 'good' are things which fulfil their telos, eg a 'good' chair is one which allows someone to sit down. Although this theory might work with inanimate objects which exist within the universe, it fails on a larger scale. One object may fulfil many purposes, and there is no boundary to which something can be considered to fulfil its telos. For example, a river may be considered 'good' if it provides water to people or animals, but it could also be considered 'good' if it continues to flow and not evaporate. Aristotle does not clearly define how to establish the final cause of something. Furthermore, the universe at large could be said to have no purpose to it at all. This is the view of Bertram Russell, who claimed that the existence of the universe is a 'brute fact', and again, Aristotle claims that the universe has a telos, but does not state what that purpose is, nor how it can be fulfilled. Hence, Aristotle's Four Causes appear to be weak in attempting to explain the purpose for things existing as some things could have many reasons for existing, or none at all, and Aristotle does not tell us how to distinguish between such final causes.
