Abstract People spend about 90% of their day indoors and are at increased risk of exposure to metal elements (MEs), water-soluble ions (WSIs) and polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons (PAHs) contained in indoor PM<sub>2.5</sub>. Therefore, firstly this study investigated indoor PM<sub>2.5</sub> pollution to explore the distribution characteristics of MEs, WSIs and PAHs. Secondly, the carcinogenic risk of MEs and PAH to the population was analyzed using health risk assessment models. Finally, the sources of MEs and PAHs were identified using statistical analyses. The results of the study show that PM<sub>2.5</sub> concentrations fluctuate between spring and winter, with the most significant fluctuations reaching around 100 µg/m<sup>3</sup> in March and January. Concentrations of most MEs, WSIs and PAHs during the heating season are twice as high as during the non-heating season. The main sources of MEs and PAHs are industrial, coal-fired emission sources, vehicle exhaust and metallurgical chemical emission sources. The non-carcinogenic and carcinogenic risks of metallic elements to the population are mainly due to Co, which contribute up to 80% in both adults and children. The carcinogenicity risk indices of the six monomeric PAHs, BaP, DbA, BbF, BkF, Inp and BaA, were greater than 10<sup>-6</sup>, indicating a potential carcinogenic risk.

Introduction

The acceleration of global urbanization and changing lifestyles have made indoor air pollution a significant public health issue (Rice et al., 2024). Environmental monitoring data from the World Health Organization (WHO) and various countries reveal that people spend approximately 90% of their day indoors, including in homes, offices, schools and vehicles (Li et al., 2023). Nevertheless, the risks of indoor air pollution are frequently underestimated compared to those of outdoor air pollution. Firstly, indoor air pollution not only degrades air quality but also poses long-term threats to occupants' health, affecting respiratory, cardiovascular, immune and mental systems (Christensen et al., 2024). Secondly, there are many types of indoor air pollution sources, including building materials, household fuels,
