The Injustice of Criminal Justice Ronald C. James, 2019 In this thesis I analyze the Criminal Justice system in America through the lens of human rights I argue that our current system which predominantly emphasizes retribution and the removal of criminals from society is a violation of human rights This argument is divided into three parts In the first part I give a brief description of the development of corrections in America In the second part I present evidence for the role that extralegal factors play in disproportionate sentencing and even the decision on what is considered criminal activity in the first place In the final section I present a particular view of human rights founded on social recognition This view lays out a vision of human dignity that is vulnerable to devastation and humiliation by others that we engage with socially at every moment depending on whether or not they decide to recognize us as human beings This argument is ultimately aimed at helping us understand the failure of the criminal justice system in the United States and how the social devaluation of those labeled criminal contributes to this process
