

3. PLANE MOTION OF A RIGID BODY

3.1. Main information from the theoretical course

3.1.1. Definition and equations of plane motion

Plane motion is motion in which each point of the moving body remains at a constant distance from a fixed plane. Each point of the body moves in a plane that is called the plane of the motion. The axis of rotation of a body remains perpendicular to the plane of the motion during the time of motion. We know that the distances between points in rigid body are constant so to prescribe the motion of any point in the body it is enough to know the motion of the plane figure of the body. This plane figure is obtained by dissecting the body by the plane of motion of any point. In our following consideration we will speak about motion of the plane figure instead of the rigid body motion.

In the previous chapters two simple motions of a body (translation and rotation) were considered. We shall now demonstrate that at each instant, the plane motion of any rigid body can be thought of as the superposition of both a translational motion and a rotational motion.

Fig. 3.1. Plane motion of a rigid body

Positions of the body are shown tinted at times t and $(t + \Delta t)$ in Fig. 3.1. Let us select any point A of the body. Imagine that the body is displaced without rotation from its position at time t to the position at time $(t + \Delta t)$ so that point A reaches its correct final position. The displacement vector for this trans-
