

The turbulent diffusion parameterization of turbulence can be used to estimate time scales for vertical transport in the troposphere (Figure 6). We wish to know the mean time \overline{Dt} required by an air molecule to travel a vertical distance Dz . Einstein's equation for molecular diffusion (derived from Fick's law) gives

$$\overline{Dt} = \frac{\overline{Dz^2}}{2D} \quad (3)$$

where, Dz is the distance traveled in any direction over time Dt (molecular diffusion is isotropic). Within the context of the turbulent diffusion parameterization, we can apply the Einstein equation to vertical turbulent motions in the atmosphere, replacing Dz by Dz' and D by Kz :

$$\overline{Dt} = \frac{\overline{Dz'^2}}{2Kz} \quad (4)$$

A mean value for Kz in the troposphere is about $2 \times 10^7 \text{ cm}^2 \text{ s}^{-1}$. It takes on average about one month for air to mix vertically from the surface to the tropopause ($Dz' = 10 \text{ km}$), species with lifetimes longer than a month tend to be well mixed vertically in the troposphere, while species with shorter lifetimes show large vertical gradients.

Exchange of air between the troposphere and the stratosphere is considerably slower than mixing of the troposphere because of the temperature inversions in the stratosphere. It takes 1-10 years for air from the troposphere to be transported up to the stratosphere, and 1-2 years for air from the stratosphere to be transported down to the troposphere. Air is transported from the troposphere to the stratosphere principally in the tropics, and is returned from the stratosphere to the troposphere principally at mid latitudes, but the mechanisms involved are still not well understood.
