ABSTRACT

Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder (ADHD) is a common neurodevelopmental disorder marked by an ongoing inattention and/or hyperactivity-impulsivity pattern. Traditional treatments targeting attentional aspects are associated with drug side effects, costly expenses, and poor compliance. This review aims to present novel approaches to attention training, such as using digital interventions to improve cognitive function mediated by video games, eye trackers, and gesture recognition sensors. The merit and shortages of these novel approaches and some new ideas of attention training in ADHD are discussed.

KEYWORDS

ADHD, attention training, Video games, Eye-tracking

ADHD is a neurodevelopmental disorder that is characterized by inattention and/or hyperactivity-impulsivity with an estimated prevalence of 5% worldwide [1]. The front-line interventions for ADHD include pharmacological medications (e.g. methylphenidate, amphetamines, atomoxetine, guanfacine, clonidine) and non-pharmacological treatments such as psychological therapies (e.g. neurofeedback, cognitive therapy, sensory integration, behavioral therapy) and dietary supplements. [2-4]. While these interventions had short-term or inconsistent efficacy [5], they tend to have drug side effects, are costly, and are associated with poor compliance, which may affect the treatment efficacy [2, 6-8]. Children with ADHD have been indicated with abnormalities in brain structures and functions associated with the neuro-cognitive function [9], which have been considered key therapeutic targets. With rapid advances in digital communication and computational technology, digital interventions for ADHD have emerged and developed rapidly. Digital interventions can target potential neural mechanisms or functions for therapeutic purposes to improve cognitive dysfunction.

In this review, we provide a brief overview of some novel attention training to improve cognitive functions through the use of digital interventions mediated by video games [10-15], eye trackers [15], or gesture recognition sensors [14]. In addition, we discussed these new methods of attention training in ADHD, which may make ADHD treatment more accessible and less expensive. The playful approach increases children's compliance and ensures the effectiveness of the training.

VIDEO GAMES

Studies have shown that patients with ADHD can focus on their favorite activities for long periods, a phenomenon
