the Sun Or Rambles in Norway R. M. Ballantyne,2019-05-09 Excerpt Fred Temple was a tall handsome young fellow of about five and twenty He had a romantic spirit a quiet gentlemanly manner a pleasant smile and a passionate desire for violent exercise To look at him you would have supposed that he was rather a lazy man for all his motions were slow and deliberate He was never in a hurry and looked as if it would take a great deal to excite him But those who knew Fred Temple well used to say that there was a great deal more in him than appeared at first sight Sometimes a sudden flush of the brow or a gleam of his eyes told of hidden fires within Fred when a small boy was extremely fond of daring and dangerous expeditions He had risked his life hundreds of times on tree tops and precipices for birds nests and had fought more hand to hand battles than any of the old Greek or Roman heroes After he became a man he risked his life more than once in saving the lives of others and it was a notable fact that many of the antagonists of his boyhood became at last his most intimate friends
