

3. Attitudes towards climate change and economic inequality: a cross-national comparative study

Kristian Heggebø and Bjørn Hvinden

INTRODUCTION

Climate change is by far the biggest challenge posed to policymakers in the 21st century (IPCC, 2014). A Special Report from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC, 2018a) concludes that global net human-caused CO₂ emissions have to fall by roughly 45 per cent by 2030 – and reach ‘net-zero’ by 2050 – if we are to reach the goal of limiting global warming to 1.5 degrees. As Debra Roberts, Co-Chair of IPCC Working Group II, puts it: ‘The next few years are probably the most important in our history’ (IPCC, 2018b). Another worrying trend worthy of political and public attention is that of increasing inequalities in income and wealth (Atkinson, 2007; Keely, 2015; OECD, 2008, 2011). The widening gap between the haves and the have-nots is a major cause of concern, especially if the level of inequality keeps on growing in the years to come. In such a scenario, a large proportion of the working age population will most likely experience reduced purchasing power, which again will lead to deteriorated living conditions, poorer housing quality, and potentially negative effects on health and wellbeing. Thus, the increasing economic inequality we have witnessed in the preceding years is very much an unfavourable development.

Both climate change and economic inequality are already prominent political issues in many countries, which prompts questions on how these two policy domains are interconnected. The emergence of stronger environmental concerns¹ along with other ‘post-material’ values have led to a shift away from traditional class-based political conflict lines and party loyalties spread across a one-dimensional Left–Right axis (see e.g., Inglehart, 1971; Inglehart and Rabier, 1986). Thus, concerns about economic inequality could go well together with involvement in environmental issues. On the other hand, climate change and economic inequality might be competitors both when it comes
