

recruitment-rotation policies' as the best approach to such workers. This is the strategy that has immigrant workers staying in a country for a number of years, then being sent home and replaced by different ones. This might be optimal in some strictly economic senses but its impact on social solidarity, the welfare state and citizen (even sometimes basic human) rights can be very disturbing.

Some of the main value of the volume lies in its very extensive factual surveys of the European scene. This is the case, for example, with Reder and Ulman's valuable review of the state of union membership and organization (slightly marred by an inaccuracy about restriction of unemployment benefit to union members in Sweden and Denmark; it is, in fact, a rather more complex matter of the channels through which benefit is paid, not entitlement to it; and the model in question is shared with Belgium (where it was invented) and Finland). Lowell Turner does an excellent job in showing the surprisingly wide coalition of forces around worker participation in management – though he neglects some interesting developments in France and exaggerates the extent to which participative management has been introduced in Britain.

Other papers go further than providing highly useful surveys and present important research findings. Soskice and Shettkat provide a refutation of the often quoted thesis that the German economy has become 'sclerotic'. Their argument deserves wide publicity; the fact that it is embedded here in a paper primarily devoted to examining the transfer of West German institutions to East Germany involves some risk of it being ignored. Mitchell and Rojot demonstrate the interesting paradox that pensions and health benefits of the universal welfare-state may well, by virtue of their portability, be more conducive to efficient and flexible labour markets than employer-based ones.

Dickens's examination of the implications for US wages and employment of European integration reaches a number of interesting conclusions. The pattern of inter-industry pay is found to be stable across time, countries and occupations. Therefore: 'High-wage industries are high-wage industries everywhere and for all workers in all occupations within the industry.' (p. 263). This creates the problem that all countries need to get into the same industries. Protectionist trade wars are therefore wrong-headed, but subsidies to high-wage industries (not low-wage ones) would be efficient up to Nash equilibrium levels, to the extent that these industries gave significant returns to scale. A further twist to the argument is that the USA is ill-advised to concentrate criticism on European agricultural protection, since breaking down these barriers would only help the Americans to increase their share of low-wage industries.

Both these books share a common starting point, which is that welfare states in most societies are changing in the light of growing discontent with the state. Welfare discourse now inevitably includes concepts like 'welfare pluralism', 'welfare mixes' and 'privatization'.
