 Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Abstract

There was a time when philosophy ruled the branches of sciences but still, it was realized that there are philosophies that are related to other branches of sciences as well and these are the sciences that included social sciences and the natural sciences. Finer categories of sciences and the disciplines are now being represented by these philosophies and these include psychology, physics, biology as well as economics.

Introduction

The philosophy of psychology deals with the mind and cognitive abilities. In the late nineties, it was seen that psychology stopped relating all the studies with philosophy and started working on the mind and its related cognitive abilities. For the last thirty years, it has been seen that there is fast growth in the field of cognitive sciences as artificial intelligence, cognitive anthropology, linguistics, and these are collectively referred to as cognitive sciences. Since that time, the philosophers of psychology are the ones who have been contributing to the scientific work in the field of psychology. As a result, it has been seen that the philosophical aspects of cognitive sciences have been studied in a deeper manner (Bermúdez 83).

There are many contemporary discussions in the philosophy of psychology and these have been considered diverse as these are inclusive of some philosophical issues related to the cognitive sciences. In this case, the areas that are discussed by the philosophers in psychology include the mind and the other related areas of psychology. Many topics that are discussed by the philosophers in psychology are the ones that arise because of the recognition that the philosophers have in cognitive sciences (Stout 45).

In this case, many theories have been presented. One of the theories deals with the causal as well as the representational level properties that are related to the
